

Acknowledgements

This work could not have come into existence without the vast discussions on China's development with many people in Asia and Western countries over the last years. I greatly benefited from their views, experiences, and insights. Yet, before proceeding with the acknowledgements specific to this work, I would like to point to the following: It is obvious that this work would have never been realised without the exceptional support of my professors and various experts as well as my family and friends, but self-evidently any mistake, inaccuracy, or misjudgement is solely my own responsibility. Concurrently, it shall be emphasised that this work reflects my personal views. In case of contradictory perspectives, I am the only one who should be held accountable for the ideas presented and none of the persons mentioned in this section.

To begin with, I am much obliged to the two professors who provided me with advice to this work, namely Prof. Dr. Erich Priewasser and Prof. Dr. Michael Kirk. From its conception to completion, they have shown particular interest in this project and have strongly supported me with their profound knowledge and insights, while simultaneously allowing me to enhance my independent academic development.

Special thanks goes to Stephan Popp who ongoingly provided most valuable insight, comments, and critic throughout the process of research and compilation. I am also greatly indebted to Sebastian Pickerodt, Markus Pfuhl, and Cord Siemon for their continuous suggestions and discussions on specific topics of this work and to Ingo Lippmann for discussions in the initial phase. The exchange of views with Feng Xingyuan, Hu Biliang, and Wei Wei has been literally indispensable. This work has benefited greatly from their willingness to share their in-depth experience. Furthermore, my sincere thanks goes to He Shanmin for her advice on Chinese translations, Wei Di for his help in finding relevant Chinese materials, and Bernd Stemmann for his technical support. Last, but definitely not least, I want to express my sincere gratitude to Rob Scheid, who thoroughly and very skilfully edited this work and to Carola Roloff (Bhikshuni Jampa Tsedron) who was a major pillar in the final phase.

I also want to thank the Department of General Business Studies and Banking at Philipps-University Marburg (Germany) for the possibility to conduct the Survey on The Capital Market and China's Development at the department, and in particular, the survey participants for their insight.

Bärbel Rothe and Sabine Kleinbrod have accompanied me throughout the entire process with their continuous encouragement. They and the late Gertraud and Günter Rothe and Frieda and Eduard Kleinbrod as well as the Venerable Geshe Thubten Ngawang have always strongly supported me and enabled me to pursue my path in life with this most inspiring combination of providing me with the great latitude to pursue my course and offering a helping hand when needed. I am particularly grateful to them for all they have done for me. This work is dedicated to them, with the hope that it is a stepping stone on the path towards the ideals they exemplify to me through their own lives.
