Acknowledgments

The last task in writing a book is to acknowledge the help of those individuals and institutions who assisted in the project. It is impossible to research and write a scholarly work without incurring such debts, both to those individuals and institutions whose publications appear in the notes and bibliography and to those whose names do not. It is, however, one chore that I have looked forward to during each of these last seven years.

I received considerable financial support from a number of sources. A grant from the Deutsche Akademische Austauschdienst (DAAD) enabled me to begin the project during the summer of 1979. A fellowship from the Alexander von Humboldt Foundation funded three subsequent research trips during 1980, 1982, and 1985. In the end its assistance extended far beyond monetary support to virtually every consideration one could imagine of a funding institution. The American Philosophical Society provided travel funds for the summers of 1979 and 1982. Finally, a Purdue University XL grant allowed me to devote the summer of 1983 to the project.

No less important were the great number of individuals who offered me their help at various stages of the research. As my sponsor for both the DAAD and Humboldt Foundation, Karl Otmar Freiherr von Aretin gave me much valuable advice, not the least of which was his suggestion that I focus my study on Frederician Hesse-Cassel. The staff of the Hessisches Staatsarchiv in Marburg reminded me in a multitude of ways of my good fortune in doing research at Germany's main archive school; in their readiness to answer my questions, Drs. Gerhard Menk and Fritz Wolff were especially helpful. Through the outstanding hospitality and facilities it offered my family, the Universitätsgästehaus of the University of Marburg was also instrumental in providing an ideal research environment. In Vienna, the director of the Haus- Hof- und Staatsarchiv, Dr.

Anna Hedwig Benna, was every bit as forthcoming as she had been ten years earlier when I first approached her as a graduate student working on Emperor Joseph I. Nor will I soon forget my guided tour of Cassel's Stadtmuseum, during which Manfred Söder supplemented my research with several bits of information that are unavailable in the published literature.

Ruth Rothenberg and her colleagues at Purdue's Interlibrary Loan Department were persistent and usually successful in obtaining titles from other American libraries. My colleague Richard Haywood complemented their work by ordering the microfilming of scores of rare books for the Purdue University Library, requisitions that were filled with unfailing regularity by Annemarie Mauersberger and her staff at the Mikrostelle of the University of Marburg Library. Gregory Pedlow and Gerald Soliday were generous in filling in gaps in my statistical data. Graduate students Scott Meiller and Paul Lockhart spent many hours entering and correlating the data in the random sample of Hessian desertions mentioned in Chapter 5, note 136.

Barbara Tuchman is doubtless correct in stating that research is endlessly enticing but writing is hard work. My colleague Mark Edwards helped reduce that burden by introducing me to the world of computers and word processing. Without his help I would have begun writing this book a year earlier – but doubtless finished it much later than I did. Once the manuscript was completed it benefited from the criticism of several of my colleagues, all of whom volunteered (at least in the Hessian sense of the word) to read it. Donald Berthrong, G. Thomas Fox, Paul Lockhart, Karl Roeder, Gerald Soliday, Garry Stice, and the late James Vann read parts or all of the manuscript.

To all these people and the many others who assisted me I express my sincere appreciation. Finally, I would like to reserve a special word of thanks to my wife, Kathleen, and my two children, Kate and Chris. If they ever read this book, which I daresay is unlikely, they will doubtless see certain parallels between these last six years and the cameralist Polizeistaat that I describe. After having dragged them across the Atlantic three times in five years and subjected them all to the demands and discipline that were necessary to complete this project, I can only express my gratitude that not one of them ever considered deserting.
