I have received much help in the preparation of this, my first book. Among my readers, I must thank in particular Pierre Vidal-Naquet and Charles Segal for their astute comments and great encouragement of the enterprise. Professor Froma Zeitlin was one of the first to see my work and has on innumerable occasions since offered me a friend's advice, close reading, and enthusiasm for the exchange of ideas on both sides of – and across – the Atlantic. Pat Easterling, who directed my Ph.D. research, not only read my work in all its forms with a patience, carefulness and critical eye far beyond the call of duty, but also provided me with a model of scholarship and sense in approaching Greek Tragedy. Above all, the classical Fellows at King's College created the sort of atmosphere and surroundings from which writing and research naturally arose. In particular, this book could not have come into being without Professor Geoffrey Lloyd, who constantly furnished stimulation to read beyond the confines of the discipline of classics, to question and think about Greek literature and society, and Dr John Henderson, whose knowledge, probing intelligence and insight were never separate from intellectual and emotional support.

The officers of the Press, Pauline Hire and Susan Moore, have been patient and diligent with an extremely difficult manuscript. And my family, especially Sho, my wife, was always there, to help see it through to the end.
