Acknowledgements

The bulk of the research for this book was done in the Bodleian Library, Oxford, the British Library, London, and Exeter University Library. I am deeply indebted to the staff of these institutions, and to those of the other libraries and archives in which I have worked on this study, namely: Bristol Central Library; Buckfast Abbey Library; Devon and Exeter Institution; Devon Record Office; Exeter Cathedral Library; John Rylands University Library of Manchester; Lambeth Palace Library; National Registry of Archives; Rolle College Library, Exmouth; and University College, London, D. M. S. Watson Library. I am grateful to the Governors and Staff Development Committee of Rolle College, Exmouth, for granting me study leave and supporting my research.

This book began life as an Exeter University Ph.D. thesis and I owe an immense debt of gratitude to my supervisor, Michael Duffy, who has guided and encouraged my studies at every stage. I have also benefited greatly from the comments of my examiners, Harry Dickinson and Bruce Coleman. In its later stages, parts of the manuscript were read by my colleague Nick Smart, and all of it by A. M. C. Waterman. Jonathan Clark has provided me with detailed comments on it which have proved stimulating and valuable and I am pleased to be able to record my gratitude for his generosity and encouragement. My friend and ex-colleague John Highfield has contributed to its development at every stage, from that evening, on the beach at Mombasa, when I outlined my initial thoughts on the project, to the final stages of preparing the manuscript; from challenging my arguments to correcting my syntax. On a personal level, my aunt, the late Miss Meta Hole, provided invaluable domestic support; it was her care of my cocker spaniel, Beatrix, which allowed me the necessary freedom to live in libraries and archives for long periods. My greatest debt, however, is to my parents, to whom this work is dedicated, for their careful attention to my upbringing and my early education.
